On September 24, 2001, I heard: "A rare earthquake is coming. You will know the end has come by a major earthquake."

The end of the world is not coming. What is coming is the end of our present wicked age or eon, but to get to this end, it is obvious that some things must happen, such as, the fall of mystery Babylon, along with the many man-centered systems associated with the great harlot city.

God has promised that He will shake the earth and the heavens until that glorious day when Jesus will be manifested as the King of kings over the nations of the earth.

I believe this quake will come to an area of the US that is not known for major quakes. It will be a rare event.

Then, at 3:19 am, on August 29, 2008, I heard: "Quake America." Sounds strange, but it fits with the idea that a rare quake is coming, or perhaps, it means that quakes will become far more frequent in the US.

Of course, we must be open to the possibility that this refers to the end-time shaking of the heavens and the earth, and that America is going to be quaked not only in the natural realm but also in man's realm of institutions and governments.

Postscript: Shortly after the 2008 word, the US, along with the entire world, entered into a great financial quake that almost brought the whole global system down in one hour on September 18, 2008. Since then, there have been many aftershocks to this quake.

But there is more to report, for on August 23, 2011, the East Coast of the US experienced a rare 5.9 quake that rumbled from New York to South Carolina and that caused damage to the top stones of both the National Cathedral and the Washington Monument located in Washington DC. In other writings I have made a connection of this damage to the toppling of the National Christmas Tree in Washington DC on February 9, 2011.
